So after I outfitted my mantle with some Silhouette trees and some tea light houses, I thought... hmmm what else does my mantle need.

I know. Toad stools.

So that is what I made next.

In the free files below, in addition to the top with holes in it, I included a solid shape for the top part of the toad stool so that if you are cutting yours by hand the project doesn't get insane and you can simply punch some holes with a hole punch. This also makes it a great craft to do with kids.

Simple, easy, quick.

I made two sizes of these toad stools.

Fun fact. Directly translated back from Danish, these are called turtle hats. No sitting implied, but instead a fashion item. Anyway.

The small one is about two inches tall, the large one is about two and a half inches tall. If you re-size the file, please take into consideration that the slit re-sizes with it.

I used 110 lb white cardstock for the base from the office supply store. It's a bit heavier than the standard cardstock from the craft store which is only 65 lb.

Here is a picture of the files so you can see the options I included.

The cut outs with and without the holes in them.

That green nail polish is called My dog sled is a hybrid. Which should be reason enough to buy it.

Punch your own holes for a completely custom toad stool.

You can make them in the traditional red version. I put a red top on both the front and the back of each toad stool and therefore the file contains two tops per base.

Or you can make them a more subtle color by using gold for the top. This is the look I am using for my mantle which will be all white and gold this year.
